NOTICE: [**1] RULES OF THE THIRD CIRCUIT COURT OF APPEALS MAY LIMIT CITATION TO UNPUBLISHED OPINIONS. PLEASE REFER TO THE RULES OF THE UNITED STATES COURT OF APPEALS FOR THIS CIRCUIT.

PRIOR HISTORY: ON APPEAL FROM AN ORDER OF UNITED STATES DISTRICT COURT FOR THE DISTRICT OF NEW JERSEY. (Dist. Court No. 00-CV-3045). District Court Judge: Alfred M. Wolin.

Vak La v. Hayducka, 269 F. Supp. 2d 566, 2003 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 10907 (D.N.J., 2003)

DISPOSITION: Appeal was dismissed.

CASE SUMMARY:

PROCEDURAL POSTURE: Appellee estate sued appellant police officer, and others, in the United States

District Court for the District of New Jersey alleging the officer used excessive force that resulted in the decedent's death. The trial court denied the police officer's motion for summary judgment wherein he asserted qualified immunity. The police officer appealed.

OVERVIEW: The appellate court initially noted that it could only review final decisions of district courts and that denials of summary judgment generally did not qualify as final for the purposes of 28 U.S.C.S. § 1291 because they allowed litigation to continue. In support of his appeal, the police officer relied on the collateral order doctrine, an exception to the final decision requirement of 28 U.S.C.S. § 1291. The appellate court held that disputed factual questions based on qualified immunity were not directly appealable under the collateral order doctrine because in an excessive force case a defendant, entitled to invoke a qualified immunity defense, could not appeal a district court's summary judgment order insofar as that order determined whether or not the pretrial record set forth a genuine issue of fact for trial. The appellate court concluded that because the factual issues remained unresolved, neither the trial court nor the appellate court could decide if the police officer violated clearly established law; therefore, the qualified immunity issue was not a collateral order.

OUTCOME: The police officer's appeal was dismissed.

Civil Procedure > Summary Judgment > Appellate Review > General Overview

Civil Procedure > Appeals > Appellate Jurisdiction > Final Judgment Rule

[HN1] Under 28 U.S.C.S. § 1291, an appellate court may review only final decisions of district courts. Denials of summary judgment generally do not qualify as final for the purposes of 28 U.S.C.S. § 1291 because they allow litigation to continue; they are but steps toward the final judgment in which they will merge.

Civil Procedure > Summary Judgment > Appellate Review > Appealability

Civil Procedure > Appeals > Appellate Jurisdiction > Collateral Order Doctrine

Civil Procedure > Appeals > Appellate Jurisdiction > Final Judgment Rule

[HN2] The collateral order doctrine gives an appellate court jurisdiction to review a district court's decision if it (1) conclusively determines a disputed question, (2) resolves an important issue completely separate from the merits of the action, and (3) is effectively unreviewable on appeal from a final judgment. Certain denials of summary judgment on the issue of qualified immunity are immediately appealable under the collateral order doctrine. A district court's denial of a claim of qualified immunity, to the extent that it turns on an issue of law, is an appealable final decision within the meaning of 28 U.S.C.S. § 1291 notwithstanding the absence of a final judgment.

Civil Procedure > Summary Judgment > Standards > Genuine Disputes

Civil Procedure > Appeals > Appellate Jurisdiction > Collateral Order Doctrine

[HN3] Disputed factual questions based on qualified immunity are not directly appealable under the collateral order doctrine. In an excessive force case, the United States Supreme Court has held that a defendant, entitled to invoke a qualified immunity defense, may not appeal a district court's summary judgment order insofar as that order determines whether or not the pretrial record sets forth a genuine issue of fact for trial. In other words, an appellate court can not decide whether defendants violated clearly established law when the underlying facts remain in dispute.

Civil Procedure > Appeals > Reviewability > General Overview

[HN4] An appellate court may review whether the set of facts identified by the district court is sufficient to establish a violation of a clearly established constitutional right, but it may not consider whether the district court correctly identified the set of facts that the summary judgment record is sufficient to prove.

OPINION

[*557] PER CURIAM:

Because we write only for the parties, we need not review the facts of this case. We dismiss this appeal for lack of jurisdiction.

Defendant claims that this Court has subject matter jurisdiction over his "appeal from the final order of the District Court denying Appellant's summary judgment motion on the issue of qualified immunity dated September 26, 2003." Hayducka's Brief at 2. [HN1] Under 28 U.S.C. § 1291, this Court may review only "final decisions" of District Courts. Denials of [**2] summary judgment generally do not qualify as "final" for the purposes of § 1291 because they allow litigation to continue; they are "but steps toward the final judgment in which they will merge." See Cohen v. Beneficial Industrial Loan Corp., 337 U.S. 541, 546, 93 L. Ed. 1528, 69 S. Ct. 1221 (1949); Hamilton v. Leavy, 322 F.3d 776, 781-82 (3d Cir. 2003).

Defendant relies on the collateral order doctrine, an exception to the final decision requirement of § 1291. [HN2] The collateral order [*558] doctrine gives this court jurisdiction to review a District Court's decision "if it (1) conclusively determines a disputed question, (2) resolves an important issue completely separate from the merits of the action, and (3) is effectively unreviewable on appeal from a final judgment." Id. (citations omitted). Certain denials of summary judgment on the issue of qualified immunity are immediately appealable under the collateral order doctrine. "[A] district court's denial of a claim of qualified immunity, to the extent that it turns on an issue of law, is an appealable 'final decision' within the meaning of 28 U.S.C. § 1291 notwithstanding the absence [**3] of a final judgment." Mitchell v. Forsyth, 472 U.S. 511, 530, 86 L. Ed. 2d 411, 105 S. Ct. 2806 (1985) (emphasis added). See also Harlow v. Fitzgerald, 457 U.S. 800, 816-19, 73 L. Ed. 2d 396, 102 S. Ct. 2727 (1982).

In Mitchell, the facts were straightforward and undisputed. The parties agreed that in November 1970, the Attorney General authorized a warrantless wiretap based on a domestic threat to national security. The only question was whether this violated "clearly established" law, given that the Supreme Court did not declare such wiretaps illegal until over a year later. This was a purely legal question, separate from the merits, and failure to decide it on interlocutory appeal would defeat the purpose of qualified immunity, which is "an entitlement not to stand trial or face the other burdens of litigation." Saucier v. Katz, 533 U.S. 194, 200, 150 L. Ed. 2d 272, 121 S. Ct. 2151 (2001) (quoting Mitchell, 472 U.S. at 526).

[HN3] Disputed factual questions based on qualified immunity, on the other hand, are not directly appealable under the collateral order doctrine. In an excessive force case much like this one, the Supreme Court held that "a defendant, [**4] entitled to invoke a qualified immunity defense, may not appeal a district court's summary judgment order insofar as that order determines whether or not the pretrial record sets forth a 'genuine' issue of fact for trial." Johnson v. Jones, 515 U.S. 304, 319-20, 132 L. Ed. 2d 238, 115 S. Ct. 2151 (1995). The Seventh Circuit, whose judgment was affirmed, stated the issue even more clearly: "Defendants do not deny that if they beat the plaintiff, as he believes they did, then they lack immunity. Whether they beat the plaintiff is a question that must be resolved before it may be reviewed on appeal." Jones v. Johnson, 26 F.3d 727, 728 (7th Cir. 1994) (per curiam) (emphasis in original). In other words, an appellate court can not decide whether defendants violated "clearly established" law when the underlying facts remain in dispute.

Johnson, not Mitchell, controls in this case, because critical facts remain unresolved. Here, Plaintiffs and Defendants offer two competing stories. In Plaintiffs' version, Kyung-Ho La was not moving toward Sergeant Hayducka when he was shot. Defendants disagree, maintaining that Kyung-Ho was lunging at Sergeant Hayducka with [**5] a 15-inch sword. The District Court carefully considered the evidence, and found "that the dispute, generated by Defendant's testimony and Dr. Hofman's expert opinion, as to whether or not the victim lunged at Defendant, creates a material issue of fact that must be presented to a jury." Joint Appendix at 17. Further, it concluded that "if the Hofman Opinion's version of the events are credible and Kyung-Ho was not lunging, but was crouching away from Hayduka then, the shooting may have been unreasonable in light of Kyung-Ho's right to be free from the use of excessive force." Id. at 55.

Because these factual issues are unresolved, neither the District Court nor this Court can decide if Sergeant Hayducka [*559] violated "clearly established" law. See Forbes v. Township of Lower Merion, 313 F.3d 144, 147 (3d Cir. 2002) [HN4] ("we may 'review whether the set of facts identified by the district court is sufficient to establish a violation of a clearly established constitutional right,' but we may not 'consider whether the district court correctly identified the set of facts that the summary judgment record is sufficient to prove'" (quoting Ziccardi v. City of Philadelphia, 288 F.3d 57, 61 (3d Cir. 2002))). [**6] Therefore, the qualified immunity issue in this case is not a collateral order "completely separate from the merits," and we apply the typical rule that denials of summary judgment are not "final" judgments for purposes of 28 U.S.C. § 1291. Accordingly, we dismiss Defendant's appeal for lack of jurisdiction.
